Case Study:

Being a medico is a matter of challenge- some relatively straight, some effort taking, some just fail despite efforts. In the end well it is a matter of satisfaction. A wise man narrated to me "love your work" and you will get the contentment. Well there was a unique case that did give me contentment, that made me understand the essence of me being a medico.

Ms A, a 19 year old girl, presented with history of altered behaviour and irrelevant talk to OPD at MMH. She was not under influence, was afebrile. She had a previous history of anaemia. She appeared pale on presentation and on intervening was identified to have haemoglobin of 3.5g/dl. Further intervention revealed a suspicion of poor production of haemoglobin (suppression of bone marrow/ aplastic anaemia). She belonged to the lower socio economic strata of the society. Considering the age and the seriousness of the condition a referral to a haematologist was made. The haematologist did the basic evaluation. The urgency to transfuse a bare minimum of two pints of blood was understood. To our surprise, the patient was sent back to us to transfuse blood. It came as a surprise, as the patient was referred for better management to a higher centre. But acknowledging the necessity to transfuse, we admitted the patient in ICU and starting transfusion at 4:30pm. The condition didn't seem convincing enough of her wellbeing. Still on a humanitarian attempt we went ahead, little did we know it is going to be a roller coaster ride.

During the consultant rounds at MMH, we were convinced her condition is due to decreased oxygen to the brain due to low haemoglobin. We tried explaining to the father, who was reluctant to accept that his daughter was not in a good shape and cannot be dealt with in our institution to cure her. Still with great pain, the consultant did explain him the situation. Following that, a letter was sent to the haematologist, to know what further plan for the patient was. He wrote and sent "transfuse two pints and after that send to our institution and thereafter we will take care of her". Furthermore, in a telephonic conversation after that he stated, to send the patient in the morning, even if it is 6:00am. So the goal was set, transfuse and send. Well on paper it seems easy, in practise was not.

The girl was so restless, that at 6 she pulled her IV line out. She due to medical reasons was restrained, put a fresh IV line and continued. In the midst of lot of unsettled patients and the girl being disoriented, only 200 ml of blood went till 9:00pm-still around half the bag left. Now if the blood doesn't finish, it may lead to transfusion reaction. On the consent of consultant, slowly blood was pulled and pushed to the patient using a syringe, over the next one and half hour. The work was not over post this as one more pint of blood was pending. We gave a mini break to our clinical team at ICU, called for blood and then resumed back to work, still the same strategy, pull and push mechanism for blood. This went on till 4:00am. Meanwhile the girl had not passed urine since admission, which was a matter of concern. Well, exhausted at that time, i was but the task was almost done. We made the discharge card and the referral letter and prepared the patient for shifting out. By this time the girl was sleeping. At 5:30am the girl was put in the ambulance and taken to higher centre.

Well, i don't know what kept us going, was it the tender age of the girl who had seemingly long life ahead, was it the tears of the father or was it the responsibility that we understood on humanitarian grounds that kept us going beyond time limits, beyond our normal strength. The crux of that is the satisfaction we receive as medicos and the blessing we understand has been given to us by the almighty- to serve in love.
